

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Contact:

Jeff Dlouhy

press@tamper.io

Tamper releases Curiosity, a beautiful context-aware Wikipedia reader for iPhone

Curiosity by Tamper helps people discover and learn about the world around them

SAN FRANCISCO, December 8, 2015 — Tamper LLC, a independent iOS company known for their award winning organizer app Morning, today released Curiosity, a beautiful location-aware Wikipedia reader for iPhone. The app surfaces interesting and relevant content to users based on their location, recent events, and hand-curated lists. Curiosity is the best companion to explore the world around you.

“Our first app, Morning, was designed for the daily routine, showing the weather, commuting time, and reminders,” said Jeff Dlouhy, Co-Founder of Tamper. “Curiosity is all about learning something new and exploring the world around you. We want people to get out an explore. From wandering a foreign city, to learning the history of your own neighborhood, Curiosity is the best app for those with the itch to discover something new.”

The creators of the app wanted the Wikipedia experience to me more than just searching for a specific topic. That’s why when the app is launched, it immediately shows context-aware articles. For example, in the Explore tab you can see what movies were filmed nearby, historic battles that took place around you, as well as other curated sections that are constantly being updated and change with location and time.

Curiosity is available today on the App Store at an introductory price of 1.99 US and runs on any Apple iPhone running iOS version 9.0 or higher.

More information is available at <https://tamper.io/curiosity/>.

About Tamper:

Tamper is a three year old independent company based in San Francisco. They are a two man team working to make the best iOS and Mac apps around. Their first app Morning was selected as an Editors’ Choice and one of the ‘App Store Best of 2013’ by Apple. Morning was also pre-installed on iPhones and iPads in the Apple Stores worldwide as a demonstration app. Curiosity by Tamper is their second app and is currently available for iPhone on the App Store.